The host perturbation by suppression of endogenous type I interferon response in an inflammatory cutaneous lesion and effects of type I interferon replacement. We examined the role of interferon (IFN) in a polymorphonuclear leukocyte (PMN)-rich inflammation of human skin and its resolution. In this study, we used IFN-alpha2b ointment to stimulate type I IFN signaling in normal human skin explants. We also induced acute inflammation in healthy human skin using a high-concentration bleaching agent (HCA), and examined the effect of IFN-alpha2b ointment treatment on cutaneous PMN recruitment, using immunostaining of PMN markers. IFN-alpha2b treatment induces neutrophilic infiltration into the dermis via paracrine or autocrine mechanisms. In addition, IFN-alpha2b treatment decreased the recruitment of CD14+ PMN into the epidermis in HCA-induced inflammation. We then sought to examine the effect of IFN-alpha2b on the progression of inflammation. IFN-alpha2b treatment decreased the expression of PD-L1, CD163, and CD204 in the dermis, which are all markers for macrophages with a proinflammatory phenotype, and increased the number of CD206+/F4/80+ 1cb139a0ed
