It relates specifically to such cutting as is used for the manufacture of plastic labels and the like. The invention relates specifically to a method and apparatus for cutting metal as well as plastic films for labels, or the like. Plasma arc cutting is a cutting technique which is particularly useful in manufacturing applications where material is to be cut as accurately as possible without damage to the article being cut. In this technique, a low-pressure plasma is generated and directed at a workpiece. The arc between the anode and the workpiece serves as the source of cutting energy. The cutting speed is often controlled, and this is done in two ways, separately or in combination. The first method is to position the torch and workpiece with respect to each other, and then activate the arc manually, by means of a trigger switch. The second method is to mount the torch and workpiece in an apparatus which automatically positions and activates the arc as desired. In this latter method, the arc is activated as the torch and workpiece are moved into position for cutting. A plasma arc torch is typically connected to a source of electric power by means of a cable having a male plug. The cable usually also
