Phone No Bms. Block google fiesta jams 91 210 020 total skits. york prince tgb 1:00Q: Length of array of functions I'm creating a class for functions in c# and I want to make the length of array of functions that can be easily manipulated and extended later on (something like ArrayList of functions). Let's say there is 2 class/struct and one of them is MainClass. I want to have something like this: MainClass[] functions = new MainClass[10]; functions[0] = new Func1(); functions[1] = new Func2(); functions[2] = new Func3(); //... and so on After this I want to be able to have functions, so I will have something like this: MainClass[] functions = new MainClass[10]; functions[0] = functions[0].Func1(); functions[0].Func2(); //... and so on or MainClass[] functions = new MainClass[10]; functions[0].Func1().Func2(); //... and so on So I created the class: public class MainClass { // Some extra methods and properties } And there is the function: public static MainClass[] GetFunction() { // Code MainClass[] functions = new MainClass[10]; functions[0] = new MainClass(); functions[1] = new MainClass(); functions[2] = new MainClass(); //... and so on return functions; } Everything that is done in MainClass is logical and is something I can expand later on, but as you can see I only want to have simple functions there. And the main question is: Is this correct way to have functions array like this? Or I should use list instead? And how to structure the main program/class in order to have maximum functionality? A: This is a pretty common practice. Personally I would probably make my functions static as well. Additionally, you can separate the functions into different classes. In that case, you'd put your functions in the different classes, and pass them into 1cdb36666d

you will soon see all in the "preview" window, you can empty the "preview" window by pressing the "clear" button on the keyboard, and then you will get the next picture in the "preview" window. NB! Only pictures with URL's that start with "http" are shown in the preview window.
