wp_cache_get_archives() works fine I'm trying to modify an existing WordPress theme's front page. If I use wp_cache_get_archives() instead of wp_get_archives(), it works great. However, if I use wp_get_archives(), it doesn't work. I'm thinking maybe the wp_get_archives() function is not recognizing the standard WP_Post object's format, so I tried changing some of the posts' formats to `post_date_gmt` and `post_modified_gmt` and that changed the posts to just plain text. Not that I have a clue what that means, but it does appear to be working. Here's the code I'm using: '10', 'cat' => '2',

Mac Mac OS X Lion.Q: How to stop PropertyChanged handler in child control when parent is updated I have a form with a child control. The parent form is bound to a database and when a field on that form is changed the value gets updated on the database. I subscribe to the property changed event for that control in the parent form and in my handler I change the field on the form as well as the database. This works fine and the changes are displayed in the form. But is there anyway to prevent the value from being changed in the database when my handler updates the control? I tried setting the new value to be the old value but this didn't seem to do anything. I assume the value of the field in the database is also updated every time but I want to be able to stop this if there is a way. Thanks for any help. A: If you are subscribed to the PropertyChanged event in the parent and set the new value in your handler using: field.OldValue =
