Uncontrolled renal failure is associated with an increased oxidative stress, which induces serious cellular damage. In this work we examined the relationship between oxidative stress and renal function in end-stage renal disease patients. The levels of copper, zinc and iron were increased in patients with normal or impaired renal function, while an increase in the content of glutathione was found only in the group with impaired renal function. The levels of the lipid peroxidation products malondialdehyde and aldehydic products were significantly higher in the patients with impaired renal function. The results indicate that during the process of uncontrolled renal failure, a significant increase in the lipid peroxidation products occurs, and this may be associated with impaired renal function in patients with end-stage renal disease.One of the reasons we keep our signature "can't tell you what it is" is that nobody pays any attention to the advice of a server in a restaurant. We're not talking about the giant foam fingers. They just lead the customers away from us. No, we mean the bread basket
